

New approaches to manage airline manuals and compliance drive end-to-end performance

As organizations streamline processes and further focus on results, data availability, relevance, and personalization should come to the forefront. They are advantages that absolutely apply to document and compliance management including the users of the content such as pilots, flight attendants, and maintenance technicians.

But current approaches delivering PDF content cannot meet key industry trends and challenges:

- Increasing user expectations for technology that meets their needs based on context and situation-specific details
- Growing demands from regulators and company policies
- Cumbersome authoring and revision processes involving multiple departments and roles
- Separate systems for handling different fleets and manuals

The ensuing difficulty end users have finding content in the many operational and company manuals makes it clear that PDF is not enough.

However, airlines can drive both organization and individual success with an end-to-end view of the document management lifecycle that connects content authoring with the actual effectiveness of those who use the content to perform their jobs.

Drivers of this approach include:

- An end user experience designed to deliver targeted content that's easy to find and use
- A single system that manages both content and regulatory compliance
- Automated workflows that increase efficiency and accuracy for cross-functional teams of Technical Publications, subject matter experts, and content users
- Universal management of OEM and company manuals for multiple fleets and airlines

Each of these capabilities offers its own individual benefits. But when they work together seamlessly, airlines can expect improved efficiency and effectiveness that maximizes business results spanning data sources, departments, and fleets.
